

The Clothier's Daughter
by Bronwyn Parry

Preview chapters

THE
Clothier's Daughter

The Hartdale Brides
Book 1

Bronwyn Parry

Firetail Press
Armidale NSW Australia

Copyright © Bronwyn Parry 2019

Published by Firetail Press, Armidale Australia

Cover Design by Lauren Sadow

Cover photography by Andrew Sadow

ISBN: 978-0-9941970-5-4 (Ebook )

ISBN: 978-0-9941970-4-7 (Trade Paperback)

ISBN: 978-0-9941970-6-1 (Large Print)

ISBN: 978-0-9941970-8-5 (Hard Cover)

All rights reserved. No part of this publication can be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, without permission in writing from the author.

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

DEDICATION

For all the teachers of literature and history at school and university who inspired and nurtured my love for both, and encouraged me to find the people of the past, especially:

Kerrie Crimmins
Helen Pilkinton
Bethwyn Wilkins
David Kent

CHAPTER 1

Friday August 9th, 1816, West Riding of Yorkshire

If the rain kept falling, her business might not survive. Stretching the crick from her neck, Emma Braithwaite stared out of the warehouse window. Spattering against the glass, the rivulets of water dissected the view out over the lower buildings across the road to the waterlogged field behind them. Across the field, row upon row of tenter frames usually had long lengths of cloth stretched to dry on them, but in this unending wet they all remained empty. On the hillside beyond the tenter fields, beyond the stream that gushed down from the fells, the new steam-powered cotton manufactory belched out smoke, darker than the grey of the clouds.

She closed her eyes against the depressing sight and concentrated on listening instead to the rhythmic sounds of the drawloom at work in the room behind her. The thunk of the treadles alternating, the wooden clatter of the shafts, the brushing of the hundreds of threads as they passed each other, and the murmured counting of Tom the drawboy, sitting on top of the loom pulling the batches of pattern threads as Jacob the weaver threw the shuttle and beat each weft thread into place.

Familiar sounds, sounds she'd known since childhood. As a small girl, she'd watched the drawloom weavers at work, awed by the delicate patterns that slowly emerged, thread by fine thread. In her innocence, she'd envied the drawboys, perched up high, pulling the ords that manipulated the pattern threads. She hadn't understood then that few children lived in large houses, that many had to work full days to earn a wage for their families instead of playing with dolls and dressing in pretty clothes as she did.

But in her childhood there'd been six drawlooms working full-time in this uppermost floor of Braithwaite and Co's warehouse, each loom producing fine figured worsted textiles for clothing and furnishings. Now five stood idle, the hand-made worsted fabrics no longer able to compete with the much cheaper, factory-produced cotton textiles. Dozens of other weavers still worked for Braithwaite and Co, on simpler looms out in farmhouses and cottages across the valleys, but fewer than there used to be.

And now it was her responsibility to continue the company founded by her great-grandfather, to oversee production and manage the business to protect the livelihoods of the weavers, spinners, dyers and finishers who had relied on Braithwaite and Co for decades. Her responsibility, alone. Until her brother returned from Canada. If he returned from Canada.

Emma turned away from the window and from that unproductive chain of thought and returned to the table where she'd spread the pattern book alongside the warehouse ledger. With its large windows facing south, the weaving loft had better light than her father's office on the floor below, and she sometimes brought her work up here.

She gently touched the small samples of fabrics in the open pattern book. Jacob, about to complete a thirty-yard length of figured cloth, needed to know what design to weave next. With its record of the firm's designs, the pattern book offered a multitude of possibilities, but the ledger contained Emma's lists of the bales of wool fabric stacked in the warehouse rooms on the ground floor. Potentially hundreds, maybe a thousand, pounds worth of woven goods, if only the weather would allow for the dyeing and finishing processes so that they could be sold. If they could be sold.

But until that happened, they only represented hundreds of pounds of debt. The combers and spinners and dyers must be paid. Jacob and all the weavers must be paid for their completed pieces.

The Clothier's Daughter

Mr. Hargraves, the factor, and the warehouse lads must be paid their wages. So did the two clerks and the copy boy in the main office on the middle floor of the warehouse. She had little spare money to pay any of them.

If the fabrics Mr. Hargraves had taken to Halifax today for tomorrow's market in the Piece Hall sold for a good price, she could pay the wages for this week. She should not ask Jacob to begin another piece until she could pay him for this one. But if he had no work, his family would go hungry.

Her head ached from constant calculations, constant decision making, constant worry.

She pulled her shawl closer around her shoulders. The persistent damp weather chilled the air despite the fire in the fireplace at the end of the loft.

The fire that seemed to be smoking. The smell tickled her nose and the drawboy coughed. Glancing across to the closed door of the stairwell, she saw a very faint haze of smoke drifting in the air.

At the other end of the room from the fireplace.

Her chair scraped loudly on the wooden floor but Jacob the weaver was already alerted and on his feet.

"There's a fire," she said. "But where?" She checked the fireplace but the wisps of smoke were too elusive and she couldn't tell exactly which way they came from.

Emma stood in the middle of the room, slowly turning, listening, searching for the entry point of the smoke. Where was the fire? Where? Was it merely the fireplace in the office below them smoking badly? Or was there a fire in the warehouse on the ground floor, packed with bales of fabric? In the stables adjoining the building, on the other side of the stone wall?

"I'll check downstairs, Miss Braithwaite," Jacob said, opening the door to the landing.

A roar of sound, air, heat and flame shook the building, throwing Jacob backwards, making the shafts of the loom clatter. The floor seemed to move and Emma staggered back against the table, sending her inkwell crashing to the floor. And all around her, a shower of ash and burning embers fell, on to the looms, on to her accounts, on to the wooden floor, and on to her and Jacob and Tom.

She could not think of how or why. No time to make sense of it. Because Jacob lay still, flames leapt through a hole in the wall between the hay loft of the stable and the stairwell, and the old timbers of the stairs were catching alight.

Young Tom helped her drag Jacob away from the doorway, and using the door as a shield she slammed it shut against the heat and flames. And against their only exit from the top floor of the warehouse.

Tom stamped out embers and smoldering clumps of hay with his feet, and she dragged her shawl off her shoulders to beat out sparks.

They might have little time before the fire spread, through floorboards, walls, roof beams, into this room. She had to think of some way they could get out of the danger. The lads in the office below, one floor up from the ground, could probably jump out the window without major hurt, assuming they were uninjured, or rescuers could bring a ladder, but the windows here, ten feet higher, could not be reached by a ladder.

Tom stared at her, just nine years old, his eyes wide with terror. “Are we going to burn, Miss Braithwaite?”

“No.” She wouldn’t let him die. “Open the window. The far one. I’ll get you out of here.”

Somehow. There had to be something up here long enough to tie around Tom so she could lower him to the ground.

But there’d be no way to get the unconscious Jacob out through the window and she wouldn’t be able to bear his weight, to lower him safely. And no way could she leave him to die.

~

After more than a day travelling in the jolting mail coach from London, Adam took pleasure in riding the last eight miles from Halifax on a hired horse, despite the steady, soaking rain. His greatcoat and beaver hat protected him from the worst of the damp, and the fresh air and solitude after the close confines of the coach made up for the minimal discomfort of the weather. Rain no longer rated as an annoyance after his years away at war.

The hired mare trotted along with an easy gait. Easier than Adam's mind. The mix of familiar landmarks and signs of major change made his thoughts see-saw between a sense of home and the unsettling sensation of strangeness, of being a stranger. Less than three miles from his family home at Rengarth, and he no longer belonged, no longer recognized some places.

Here, in the small town of Hartdale, a new bridge crossed the now-finished canal that flowed south from the fells into the river. Two new factories and several new warehouses lined its banks.

Smoke billowed out from the factory chimneys, dark against the grey of the clouds, and the noise of the steam-powered machinery vibrated in the air.

Only those with urgent purpose ventured out into the rain, and Adam saw few people about, even in the market square. They dashed from the shelter of one building to another, under an umbrella, or with coat collars pulled high and heads bowed under hats. No-one recognized him. No-one even looked twice at him, more concerned with keeping dry than acknowledging passers-by.

But as he passed the Hartdale Arms, a shout caught more than one person's attention.

Adam didn't hear the words the first time over his horse's hoof beats, but he heard the urgency, and he heard them the second time as a young man raced down the road.

"Fire! Get the fire cart!"

Adam kicked the mare forward, around the crook in the street. The grey smoke he'd assumed rose from a chimney came instead from a warehouse, and flames leapt up from behind it.

Josiah Braithwaite's warehouse. And a neatly-dressed lad leaned out from an upstairs window, calling for help, for a ladder, for water.

A boy—a child—struggled to lift a full bucket of water from a water butt almost his height.

Adam swung off his horse, lifted the bucket, and tossed the reins to the boy. "Take her to the Arms," he ordered, as if the boy was one of his soldiers. "Tell them Major Caldwell says to bring every ladder and bucket they can find. And stout ropes."

Still puffing from exertion, the boy's grimy face was wide-eyed with excitement and trepidation. Just a child, not a soldier. "Johnno's gone for the fire cart."

Adam softened his voice. "Good. We'll need them and more. Hurry now."

Underneath the window, Adam called up to the desperate lad above, "How many of you up there?"

"Three here, sir. But-"

Someone near Adam took up the shout of "Fire! Get the fire cart!" and he barely made out the trapped lad's panicked words, "-Braithwaite is in the loft."

Josiah Braithwaite? Or his son, Matthew? It didn't matter. Adam sized up the height of the building and swore. Too tall for a ladder to reach the weaving loft.

He remembered the basic layout of the warehouse from the one time he'd been inside it and rapidly assessed the situation. The entrance at one end, off the street, leading into the showroom and the warehouse rooms with all the bales of finished and unfinished fabrics. The stairs to the middle floor led to the large counting room where the clerks worked, with Josiah Braithwaite's office at the opposite end of the building from the stairs. Above the counting room, the weavers' loft, with large south-facing windows for light. At the rear of the building, the double warehouse doors opened on to the courtyard, with the stables to the side, abutting the warehouse.

The main roar of the fire seemed to be coming from the back, from the stables, but thick smoke swirled in front of the window glass near the main entrance door, pierced by the orange-red flicker of flames.

No way out through there. A decade of war and too many burning buildings had taught the harsh lesson that to even open that door would send a rush of air to feed the flames into an inferno.

He pushed aside memories of a burning farmhouse and the screams of trapped soldiers. Not here. Not today. The continued rain and damp must reduce the heat and power of the fire. He would get these people out of the building, alive.

He slipped into battle readiness—focused only on the job to do, allowing no time for feelings or fear—and gave orders because there was no-one else to take charge.

“Get into Mr. Braithwaite’s office,” he called up to the young clerk. “Close the door and open the window.”

The clerk coughed and disappeared from view. On the top floor, someone shattered some of the panes of the end window. He couldn’t see who.

Several men with buckets rushed up the street. “Don’t open the front door!” Adam ordered. “Go round the back. Do what you can there to douse the flames.” There’d be water butts and troughs for horses around the stable yard. Not much hope for any horses in the stables, but he could hear none, and hoped there were none.

A woman hurried from a house across the street awkwardly carrying a ladder, tears running down her cheeks. “Please sir,” she gasped, “My boy...my boy’s in there.”

With a brief word of reassurance, Adam set the ladder against the wall of the warehouse. It barely reached the window of Braithwaite’s office on the middle floor. But it was close enough. Close enough for the clerks in the counting room. Nowhere near close enough for Braithwaite and anyone else on the top level.

The woman—sensible despite her anxiety—held the base of the ladder steady while he quickly ascended and hauled himself in through the window. The three clerks—two youths, and one boy around twelve years old—gathered close to give him little-needed help. They’d had the sense to close the door between Braithwaite’s office and the larger room and although smoke scratched his eyes, the flames had not yet reached here. They had several ledger books and the cash box stacked by the window.

The tallest of the clerks pushed the boy forward. “William must go first, sir.”

Adam nodded agreement and lifted the lad to the window sill, holding his arms while William felt with his feet for the top rung of the ladder. The boy's mother called encouragement and William made his way down to be hauled into a close embrace. As Adam assisted one of the clerks over the window ledge, a man took the goodwife's place, holding the ladder steady.

The younger clerk was half-way down when the man at the base shouted, looking up, and Adam twisted to see above the window. Two small legs dangled, one shoe hanging loose, as someone in the loft lowered a child, inch by inch. As the legs came level, Adam grabbed them, guiding the swaying child towards the ladder. A wide strip of fabric wrapped around his chest, tied in a knot almost thicker than the skinny body, long ends of threads hanging. Braithwaite must have cut a web from a loom. Good thinking. Up to thirty yards on a piece of cloth, long enough to reach the ground.

While the boy—young, maybe eight or nine years old—clung to the ladder, Adam tugged the knot loose so the cloth could be used for another person.

“Down you go, lad. You're safe now.”

The boy's lip trembled. “Miss Braithwaite and Uncle Jacob—you'll save them, won't you?”

His words shattered Adam's detached focus. “Miss Braithwaite? Miss Braithwaite is up there?”

He must have said it forcefully, because the boy barely nodded before he scampered down the ladder.

“Yes, sir,” the clerk behind Adam said. “Miss Emma Braithwaite. She's the senior partner now, sir.”

Barely hearing anything past the confirmation, Adam leaned half his body out the window, straining to see upwards.

“Emma!” The length of fabric obscured his view and he pulled it out of his way. There was no-one at the window. She was somewhere inside there, in the smoke and the fire. “Emma!”

He saw movement, and then her face, almost as pale as the white lace of her collar. She saw him but with the smoke all around she didn't recognize him, didn't know him.

“I can't lift Jacob,” she called down to him, to those below, panic sharpening her voice. "I can't lift him and I won't be able to hold his weight."

He closed his fist around the fabric, gripping it tight. "Fasten the cloth to a beam or something heavy. I'm coming up."

She properly saw him then, visibly startled. "Adam?" She shook her head, urgency overpowering her astonishment. "I can't. There's only the loom, and it's not heavy enough. It just moves."

Adam swore. He strode across and opened the office door so that he could check the door to the stairs, twenty feet away, near the front wall of the building. The smoke flowed under it, but he could see no flames licking the edge of the door itself. At the other end of the wall, where it met the back wall, the paper curled and smoked, but not near the door.

He returned to the open window and called up again, "Stay near the window, Emma. I'm coming to get you."

He still wore his great coat, thick wool wet through after hours in the rain. Woolen breeches, leather boots, leather riding gloves. His beaver hat had fallen to the floor when he'd clambered through the window, and he swept it up, jamming it on his head as he pulled his damp cravat up over his face.

The clerk began to follow as he crossed the room. "Sir, you're not going to..."

"Yes. Get down that ladder, man. Now."

The metal of the door handle was warm through his gloves, but not searing hot. Not yet. With his ear to the door he held his breath and listened. Over the sound of his heart beats, the harsh crackling of fire eating wood, but not right outside the door. He opened it cautiously, keeping behind it. Smoke rushed in, and noise and heat, but not flames.

Immediately to his left, the stairs rose from the small landing to the upper floor. But there was a hole in the back wall, near the top landing, and the stairs leading to the lower floors were well alight, flames leaping upwards, and thick, choking smoke filling his nose and throat despite the small protection of his loosened cravat.

Flames worked on the bannisters, and some of the steps smoked, small pockets of flames breaking through.

He could make it. He had to make it.

He sucked in a breath and took two paces backwards, then ran into the hell of flames and smoke. Up the stairs, two by two, heat singeing the cotton around his face, throwing himself forward as the wooden treads shifted under his boots, reaching the top landing and grasping the door handle as the supports below the flight of stairs gave way.

With his weight yanking the door handle down, he swung himself inside the loft, slamming the door shut against the roar of the flames as the stairs collapsed to the floors below.

The floor directly beneath him shook but held. His lungs screamed for air and he coughed violently, staggering a few feet.

“Adam!” From the far end of the room, Emma rushed towards him but he drew enough breath to meet her part-way, taking her arm to guide her back to the fresh air coming through the open window. If the flames burst through—when the flames burst through—he wanted her already gone, already safe.

The weaver lay unconscious, near the window. A good-sized man, thick with muscle. She had done well to drag him this far.

But her attention now was on him, checking him for injury, smothering a smoldering shirt cuff with her shawl. “You shouldn’t have risked yourself, Adam. They’ll be here with the fire cart soon.” Her breath caught. “You could have died.”

“Wet wool is armor,” he said. “But we must hurry. I’ll lower you down, then him.”

“No. Jacob goes first. He has a family to support. And it will need both of us to lift him.”

Adam knew her well enough not to argue. He knelt beside the weaver, checking for signs of life. Blood seeped from the man’s head, but a pulse tapped evenly against his fingers.

Emma had already hauled back the length of worsted fabric, and had one end tied to the loom, the other near the man. As Adam lifted him by the shoulders, she wrapped it around his chest, the knot she tied thick enough to give a little support to his drooping head.

The Clothier's Daughter

Flames broke through the wall at the far end of the room, and something else collapsed with a resounding crash. Choking smoke billowed into the room.

She gasped but didn't scream, focused on helping him to lift the dead weight of the weaver up onto the window sill, his legs over the edge. She guided the weaver's body as Adam stripped off his gloves and gripped the makeshift rope, the taut, bunched fabric harsh against his hands.

He battled against the desire to let the man drop quickly so that Emma could go. But to drop him too fast might kill him, if his injuries weren't already deadly. Inch by inch, foot by foot, it seemed to take forever. In reality, it might have been a minute. The flames had hold of the far wall.

"They've got him," Emma said, and the dead weight suddenly lessened as the man reached waiting arms below.

"Untie him," Adam bellowed through the window. While he hauled the makeshift rope hand over hand back up, Emma wrapped two thick ledger books in her shawl.

"Leave those," he said, as he readied to tie the cloth around her.

She held the bundle tight to her chest. "No. I need the records of debtors and creditors. And the pattern book has our history."

Logical, and it took no more time to save them than it did to save her. He passed the cloth around her to tie it over the books, the cloth helping to hold them in place. Her skirts hampered her as he helped her climb to the window.

He put a hand on her shoulder to guide her. "Back out. Use your feet against the wall. Don't look down." He gripped the makeshift rope with both hands and braced himself as she maneuvered out the window.

Another few seconds, another minute, and she would be safe.

He wasn't sure if he had much longer than that to get out alive himself.

~

Hands steadied her as she came close to the ground and she reached with her feet for solidity. Above her, Adam's face strained to lower her steadily, his gaze never leaving her.

Adam. Adam Caldwell. That he should be here, now, after eight years...

Her feet found the cobblestones and she steadied herself with a hand against the warehouse wall.

Voices shouted all around, people crowding her, and someone took the ledgers from her but she could only think of Adam, still up there in the burning loft, and she tugged at the thick knot around her chest, coughing in the wet, cold air, sobbing as she struggled to undo the now damp cloth.

Work-worn hands came into her vision, gently pushing hers away to take over the task. Goodwife Harris, the mother of young William, the new copy boy.

"It's all right, Miss Braithwaite. I'll get you out of this." Her fingers worked nimbly as she soothed with chatter. "Someone said that it's Captain Caldwell up there. The old Earl's son, isn't he?"

"Major Caldwell." She'd read the notice in the Gazette, after Waterloo. His promotion, and his appointment to the Duke of Wellington's staff in the Paris embassy.

Freed from the twisted cloth, Emma allowed herself to be drawn back, away from the warehouse, away from the heat and danger. The warehouse door hung open, half off its hinges, flames flicking out above it. A chain of men with buckets kept a constant pace, throwing water at it, held back by the heat, the liquid only sometimes hitting the flames in a hiss of steam.

Horses hooves clattered up the street, sending bystanders scattering. The fire cart, at last. Only one, in this small town. Owned by the insurance company in Halifax, to whom Emma paid the premium sum to guarantee the services of the fire cart. Guaranteed, if not prompt. It seemed like hours since the fire had burst through from the stables. But the men on the cart began pumping before the horses had fully halted.

At the high window, Adam straddled the window sill, maneuvering to get a good hold of the cloth rope. She could just see the shape of the loom, drawn hard up against the wall. Good, it should hold there for him. He swung his body over the sill and began a slow descent, hand over hand, his feet walking down the wall.

Emma breathed out and looked away. He had to make it down safely, without falling, without fire billowing out through the window or walls. She couldn't bear to see it if anything went wrong.

"Miss Braithwaite!" Ned, the senior of the two young clerks, pushed his way through to her.

"You're all unhurt?" she asked. "You and Theo and Will are all safe?"

"Yes, Miss. We all got out fine. And Jacob woke up just now. He's spoken quite clearly, Miss, and he can move all right. They've taken him to his sister's."

Relief made her head spin. They were all safe, all her employees. No-one left in that inferno. She made herself think straight. She still had responsibilities to see to. "I'll go there. Ned, find the constable and tell him where I am. He will want a report."

"Out of my way!" The commanding voice parted the crowd as a tall, well-dressed man shouldered his way through. Emma smothered a groan. Not Robert. Not here. Not now. With an effort, she straightened her shoulders to face him.

"Cousin Emma! I heard... Good Lord, you were in there!" He jabbed a finger at Ned. "Don't just stand around, man, go and fetch a doctor this instant!"

She took a breath to protest but the sudden air scratched her raw throat and she coughed, again and again, unable to stop. Made giddy by the wracking convulsions, her head became heavy and the street beneath her feet tilted this way and that.

She would not faint in front of Robert. She would not. But she could scarcely draw breath, her lungs screamed for air, and black spots danced in front of her eyes.

"Smelling salts!" she heard Robert call. "Someone fetch some smelling salts!"

The mere thought of the biting aroma of the salts made her throat close further. She tried to shake her head, but the spots in her vision swelled into darkness. Her head hit Robert's arm as she collapsed.

CHAPTER 2

Adam let himself drop the last few feet to the ground as another crash inside blew a cloud of smoke and cinders out of the door, sending those in the bucket line staggering backwards, out of the way. The men on the back of the fire cart ducked but hardly missed a beat in their pumping, pushing the handles alternately up, down, up, down as others aimed the hose through the doorway.

On his way down, past the counting room window, he'd seen few flames encroaching from the stair well. In this damp weather, there might still be a chance of saving some of the building, now that the fire cart had arrived.

But while he looked around for Emma, Adam used his officer's voice and stance to direct the gathering crowd further back, away from the building. A huddle of people across the road ignored his directions. On the edge of the group he recognized the older of the two young clerks, the thick ledger books and cash box still clutched to his chest, and crossed to him.

"Miss Braithwaite swooned, sir," the clerk told him, nodding towards a wooden bench outside the shop, where Emma sat, a handkerchief to her mouth, strands of loose hair falling across her pale face. The goodwife sat beside her, and a gentlemen stood in front of her in a proprietary manner, as if to shield her from view. "Mr. Braithwaite has sent for his carriage to carry her home."

"Matthew Braithwaite?" Adam guessed. The man stood too tall to be Josiah, Emma's father. But Matthew would be twenty-six now, a man, not a youth.

"No, sir. Mr. Matthew is in the Canadian colonies. Mr. Robert Braithwaite, of the Braithwaites of Sowerby."

Robert Braithwaite. Adam vaguely recalled a stiff, reserved boy at school in York. A cousin—second cousin?—of the local family.

"You are familiar with the family, sir?" the clerk enquired, politely curious.

Of course he was curious. Adam had called her Emma, shouting it out the window for all to hear. Emma, not the 'Miss Braithwaite' he should have used. He'd barely arrived back and already he'd possibly put her in a difficult position. Again. And there was Robert Braithwaite, attending to her as if he had the right to do so. For all Adam knew, he might have. Her employees still referred to her as 'Miss Braithwaite' but she could easily be betrothed. What man in his right mind wouldn't want a woman like Emma? Her beauty and common sense at seventeen had become more so, now. She hadn't panicked in the fire. She didn't fall apart now. Her composure and practical actions had saved the lives of her employees.

"Our families are neighbors," he explained to the clerk, as if that might douse any gossip. "I am Adam Caldwell."

Hampered by the burdens he carried protectively, the young man bowed. "I am honored, sir. I am Ned- Edward Langton, at your service, sir."

On the bench, Emma made an attempt to tidy her hair as she rose to her feet. Braithwaite hastened a step closer and said something Adam didn't hear, but Emma replied clearly despite some huskiness in her voice, "Thank you, Cousin Robert, but I am quite recovered."

A postilion, holding the harnesses of a well-matched pair, led horses and coach along the street, stopping some distance from the fire, the horses already skittish.

"There's my coach," Braithwaite said. "Cousin, please allow me to escort you home. Perhaps this good woman would accompany you? To attend to your needs. Unless you have a maidservant here?"

At least Braithwaite had some sense of propriety. Either that or he feared being alone with a lady who might be taken faint again.

Not that Emma appeared to be unsteady now. “No, I have no maid here. I must ensure that a doctor is sent to Jacob.” She searched the crowd, and Adam stepped back in to the shadows. Langton excused himself, and went to assist his employer.

A polite cough behind him made Adam spin around. “Begging your pardon, Major Caldwell. Could I have a word, sir?”

The man supported himself on crutches too short for his height, his left leg missing below the knee. He wore the remnants of a soldier's uniform, a tattered and worn coat, the facings signifying Adam's own regiment. It took Adam several moments to place the face.

“It's Garrett, isn't it?”

“Yes, sir. Nathaniel Garrett. I were a sergeant.”

The rain had begun falling again and Adam waved the man towards an old shop from Tudor times, with an overhanging upper floor.

Suspecting he was about to receive a supplication for money, Adam asked brusquely, “What is it, Garrett?”

“The fire, sir. I haven't heard anyone saying it yet, but the constable needs to know, and better that this comes from you, rather than the likes of me. There was an explosion, sir, not long after the fire started. I were just in the lane there. First I sniffed the smoke, but everyone that can has a fire burning today. But then there was the explosion. Not mighty loud, but loud enough. And the smell of black powder, in among the smoke.”

“You're sure? It wasn't just some part of the warehouse collapsing? Or the stables behind it?”

The man eyed him steadily. “No, sir. I know the sound and smell of black powder exploding.”

An explosion. Adam surveyed the warehouse, where the bucket brigade and fire cart seemed to be winning against the flames. What on earth was there to explode, in a warehouse full of worsted goods? In the Braithwaite's warehouse of worsted goods? He could hardly imagine Josiah—or Emma—running smuggled goods, let alone gunpowder. Enough gunpowder to do damage. Josiah leaned towards Quakerism, had never even taken part in shooting sports, to Adam's knowledge.

"Do you live here in town, Garrett?"

He shrugged. "Here and about. Not much work for an old cripple."

Old? The man was scarcely older than him. But there was a weariness in the harsh lines of his face, and he was only one of many former soldiers, out on the roads of England, searching for work. Little enough work around, and even less for a one-legged man. He doubted a military pension was enough to live on.

He remembered Garrett as a quiet, taciturn man, and a good sergeant, tough but fair with his men, and with a better understanding of soldiering than many of the young officers. Wise enough not to openly refuse or disobey orders, but to circumvent them when necessary. A man with more intelligence and sense than many. The kind of soldier that called officers 'sir' to avoid accusations of insolence, not out of any degree of respect.

"If you're willing to do some work for me, Garrett, I want to know more about that fire."

Garrett hesitated but eventually nodded, and Adam gave him some coins. "I want you to keep your eyes open and listen to the talk. Get yourself a good meal at the Arms. And meet me there tomorrow at ten."

Garrett studied the coins for a moment, wary, before he pocketed them. Adam figured they'd earn him at least twenty-four hours of conscientious listening and observation.

After Garrett limped away, Adam went in search of the town constable. He found him watching the fire from the dry shelter of the stationer's shop.

Not a man Adam remembered. Stout and ruddy-faced and years younger than the old constable, who often had good reason, long ago in the past, to issue stern warnings to a reckless lad from the castle.

The man pushed himself to his feet. "Major Caldwell, I believe?"

The Clothier's Daughter

Adam nodded assent. "And you are?"

"Bert Williams, sir. Would your brother, His Lordship, be returned to the Castle, perchance?"

"No. He and Lady Rengarth remain in London for now."

"Ahh. I see. Then perhaps if you would be so kind as to inform her ladyship, the Dowager Countess, of this incident? Blasted Luddites are causing trouble everywhere. But who'd have thought they would strike here, in the heart of our town, in day light?"

"You believe this is the work of Luddites? Of machine breakers?"

"Started in the stables, it did. The horses and the stable boy went off to Halifax this mornin' with Hargraves, the factor. No-one there, see. Lucky for the horses."

"Indeed. But if the fire started in the stables, how do you believe it broke through into the warehouse?"

Williams shrugged. "It's an old building. Nigh on a hundred years. Roof rafters could have lit up."

"It's an old stone building," Adam corrected. "And the fire has yet to take hold in the roof." He didn't say anything about the hole he'd seen in the wall, or Garrett's report of an explosion. Not yet. Not until he had more of the constable's measure. A good constable would be asking these questions himself.

He had plenty more questions, and a number of possibilities, but he did not wish to put anyone on guard, until he had a better idea of the context. The last year on the Duke of Wellington's staff had certainly honed his instinct for holding his cards close.

He took his watch from his pocket to check the time. A plain watch, the case marked by years of hard use. But he did not miss the constable's quick, assessing glance at it. An avaricious man, the constable. Interesting.

"I must be on my way. My mother is hosting a ball this evening."

"Yes, yes, Her Ladyship's ball. Many fine people attending, I understand."

Anyone of any social standing in the West Riding. His mother's annual ball was the highlight of the summer, and an opportunity for the introduction of the season's crop of young ladies to society. For which reason Adam, a single man, would have preferred to face a hundred diplomatic conferences in Europe than to attend the ball. But duty called. He owed his family, and Rengarth, much more than that.

He nodded across to the warehouse. “They will have that under control shortly. Make sure that they keep watch overnight to prevent any flare-ups. And set a guard so that there is no looting. Meet me here in the morning, at nine o’clock. We will investigate further, then.”

The constable started to protest. “But sir, the insurance agent-”

Adam raised an eyebrow. It sufficed to remind Williams who he was. “The agent will not be out from Halifax before nine. We will meet here then.”

As he strode down to the Arms to retrieve his horse, he went over and over what little he knew so far. Matthew Braithwaite was in the Canadian colonies. There’d been no sign of Josiah and no-one had mentioned him. Perhaps he was dead, or infirm. But if he was, that left only Emma and her younger sisters. And Emma had been there, working in the warehouse, an ink stain on her fingers, the staff speaking respectfully to, and of, her.

Even at seventeen she’d had a strong head for business. Perhaps better than her father’s. It made sense that with her brother away, she would have charge of things.

But she’d been in that warehouse when someone had likely set it alight, and she could easily have died.

Thank you for reading these preview chapters!

The Clothier's Daughter is available in e-book and paperback from all the major online sellers. You can also ask your local bookshop to order the paperback, or request your local library to add it to their collection, in print or in e-book.

The Clothier's Daughter is the first book in the planned Hartdale Brides series. Each book in the series will be a complete, stand-alone story, loosely linked to the others.

To read more about Bronwyn and her books, please visit her website at <http://bronwynparry.com>